If you love yourself, do it for you. At the end of the day, it's a matter of self-respect.

It's natural for friendships to come and go as you change and learn more about yourself. If it's time to move on, let your friendship drift apart gradually, rather than fighting. Remember, Levine says, "A best friend today can easily become a frenemy tomorrow."

"You can downgrade the friendship by being less available and spending less time with the person," Levine says. "This can be difficult if the decision is one-sided, but it's important not to hurt or blame the other person. You have to think about how it will affect other mutual friendships. When you dump someone, there's no going back."

ASK POPPY

Poppy Fields, the teen popstar, answers the questions you have all been dying to ask.

So Poppy, how are you finding London so far?

I love it here. The air's different.

How is the air different?

I don't know. It feels different. I was in a really high altitude part of the US for a while, so it's really hard to breath out there. It's nice here, I like it here. No one really knew I was coming, but there were like 40 kids at the airport last night which was really cool, it was like eleven o'clock at night. It was fun to stop and get to meet them all. That's fun for me.

What are your UK fans like?

It's so funny because it's a little different to the US. It's a bit more diverse here. There were a lot of girls, but also a lot of guys.
